Louis XVI tries

András Schiff is featured as both conductor and soloist in this concert of the final piano concertos of Haydn and Mozart, who although a generation apart in age were friends and supporters of each other's music.

Joseph Haydn is much better known for his chamber music and symphonies than for his concertos, yet a few of his surviving ones (many are lost) proved important additions to the repertory of the Classical period. The best known of his keyboard concertos is his last, the most popular in his own time and ever since.

Over nearly two decades, Mozart brought the genre of the piano concerto to new heights. His final essay, now known as the Concerto No. 27, is more intimate than many earlier ones, a late reflection on the instrument of which he was a master.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is the only orchestra in the world with three weekly broadcasts on SiriusXM's Symphony Hall, Channel 76, on Mondays at 7 PM, Thursdays at 12 AM, and Saturdays at 4 PM.

Piano Concerto in D major

Joseph Haydn

Born in Rohrau, Lower Austria, March 31, 1732

Died in Vienna, May 31, 1809

Many concertgoers who are familiar with Joseph Haydn's hundred-plus symphonies may be unaware that he also composed more than 30 concertos, including at least 11 for string instruments, seven for winds, and a dozen for keyboard. Many of them are now lost, and still others are of such dubious authenticity that it is best not to bill them as being by Haydn.

Only a handful of the composer's concertos appear with much frequency in the concert hall these days—most notably the two for cello and the Trumpet Concerto in E-flat major. He composed some early keyboard concertos for his own use, usually for organ, but most of the others were either commissions, including from the King of Naples, or written for specific performers. Among these keyboard works, the one in D major performed on this concert is the most often played, both in the composer's day and in our own.

Haydn's Last Concerto Most of Haydn's concertos remain relative rarities in contrast to those of his friend Mozart and of his student Beethoven. A clue to explaining this is found in a review from 1785 of the newly published piano concertos in D and G in which the critic called them "very well composed. They appear to be brand new, but seem to have been composed for some particular connoisseur." Even during Haydn's lifetime his music was perceived as slightly "high-tone," more sophisticated than that of most composers. This was partly related to his employment: For 30 years he was court composer for the Esterházy princes, first at their Eisenstadt castle near Vienna and later at the splendid Eszterháza Palace in what is now northwestern Hungary. The princes were musical connoisseurs, particularly Nikolaus. Haydn's main purpose was to provide them with the most wonderful music he could muster—for their enjoyment and, occasionally, for them to perform.

Haydn apparently composed the D-major Concerto between 1780 and 1782, during a period in which he was preoccupied chiefly with composing and directing opera for the court. Although the manuscript of the work is lost and he did not enter it into the catalogue he kept of his compositions, the authenticity of this, his last concerto, is uncontested. First published in 1784, it was reprinted many times in Haydn's lifetime by different firms in five countries. Like most of his keyboard concertos, the D major is designated in early editions as being pour piano forte ou clavecin (for fortepiano or harpsichord). This was often a marketing technique, intended to maximize sales; in this case, however, the Concerto does seem suited to either instrument.

A Closer Look Contrary to the German critic's statement above, the D major is one of Haydn's most "popular"-sounding works. Comparison to Mozart's concertos is inevitable here—especially since some have speculated that Haydn wrote it under the influence of the younger composer's works heard in Vienna. "Whereas Mozart prefers to allot new material to the soloist when he first enters alone," writes H.C. Robbins Landon, in a discussion of the opening Vivace of Haydn's D-major Concerto, "Haydn always uses the material of the ritornello again. In the Concerto in D, the opening theme of the tutti is, accordingly, the basis for the soloist's entrance." The slow movement (Un poco adagio), however, is indeed like the florid "arias" of Mozart's concertos.

Extroverted in mood, this Concerto appears consciously to have been written in a style that reflected Haydn's ongoing interest in folk music. "Some years after Haydn's establishment at Eisenstadt," wrote the early biographer and friend Giuseppe Carpani, "when he had formed his style, he sought food for his imagination by diligently collecting those ancient and original airs found among the peoples of every country. Ukraine, Hungary, Scotland, Germany, Sicily, Spain, Russia—all fell under his interest." Many of Haydn's chamber works manifest this interest in folk melodies, which is found here as well: He marks the finale of the Concerto Rondo all'Ungherese (in the Hungarian style). Haydn employs folk-dance melodies that have been identified as stemming from Bosnia or Dalmatia, tunes he might have heard during his youth in what is now Croatia.

Martha Argerich was pianist in the first complete Philadelphia Orchestra performances of the D-major Concerto, in October 1977 with Eugene Ormandy conducting. The first movement was played on a Children's Concert in April 1951, with pianist Leah Mellman and Alexander Hillsberg conducting. In 1957 a 10-year-old André Watts played the first movement on a Children's Concert, quietly launching his career. Mostly recently on subscription, the Concerto was performed by Leif Ove Andsnes with André Raphael Smith on the podium..

The work is scored for an orchestra of solo piano, two oboes, two horns, and strings.

Performance time is approximately 20 minutes.

Piano Concerto No. 27

Wolfgang Amadè Mozart

Born in Salzburg, January 27, 1756

Died in Vienna, December 5, 1791

Mozart is synonymous with extraordinary talent. Mendelssohn is the “Mozart” of Romantic composers; John Williams is the “Mozart” of the movies. Some artists compare themselves to him. Joni Mitchell infamously heard Mozart in her own songwriting and Kobe Bryant mentioned the composer in an interview: “I’ve shot too much from the time I was eight years old. But ‘too much’ is a matter of perspective. Some people thought Mozart had too many notes in his compositions. Let me put it this way: I entertain people who say I shoot too much. I find it very interesting. Going back to Mozart, he responded to critics by saying there were neither too many notes or too few. There were as many as necessary.”

The Mozart Mystique The typical Mozart piano concerto is brilliantly multifaceted: It contains catchy tunes, complicated structures, and many notes. These notes ooze panache, authenticity, and a disdain for authority. Mozart partied with aristocrats he did not respect, traveled all over Europe in fashionable carriages, jumped into the arms of a queen, and performed with his sister before legions of flabbergasted fans. During a trip to London, a scientist performed tests on him, and made him improvise and sight-read unknown operas. At the end of the session, Mozart ran off to play with a cat.

The Mozart mystique lives on in his piano concertos. He wrote some 27, most of them during his last 10 years living in Vienna between 1781 and 1791. To make extra money, he dedicated some of them to adoring students, as he had squandered much of his newly earned wealth, likely to gambling and excessive living. His final year, 1791, was one of recovery. At his most productive, he composed the operas The Magic Flute and La clemenza di Tito, a good portion of the Requiem, the Clarinet Concerto, and his Piano Concerto in B-flat major, K. 595, which he dated January 5, 1791, in his thematic catalogue, although a doubting musicologist believes that he had begun the piece as early as 1788.

Mozart premiered the three-movement Concerto on March 4 as part of a concert given by the clarinetist Joseph Beer. Mozart was appointed to the post of assistant chapel master at St. Stephen’s Cathedral that year. Things were looking up, until they weren’t. In November 1791 he fell ill and ultimately died of acute rheumatic fever. Legend has it that he thought he had been poisoned while working on the Requiem, which in a fog of illness, he began to think he was composing for himself.

A Closer Look Mozart's dramatic life, full of heartache and quirky premonitions, is captured in his piano concertos. Some are in minor keys; one imitates the singing of his annoying pet starling. The last, K. 595, begins and ends like his own ode to joy. The first theme (Allegro) is pastoral and followed by wind flourishes. Soon one hears twitters of instability, wrongish notes, and ironic embellishments. The exposition comes to a stable close, waiting in the shadows for the pianist, who strides in confidently and carefree. Lots of notes ensue. Oboes stop the action, interjecting some needed self-reflection, and the orchestra returns in its expected ritornello. Confidence is key to art, and Mozart is brash here. Sinuous lines enter seemingly without direction. The development is abstract and presages later Beethoven. The first theme returns and the first movement is punctuated with a cadenza, or solo passage, with some regret and flashy scales. The movement closes in a piano dynamic.

The second movement, Larghetto, features the pianist performing a transcendent melody, followed by a French horn arpeggio. The movement consists of a series of repeats of the unbeatable theme, punctuated by unexpected forte dynamics. Mozart pulls at the heartstrings, showing his penchant for subtle, yet overwhelming ideas. The French horns provide a steady foundation.

The third movement (Allegro) makes use of the melody from his song "Komm, lieber Mai" (Come, dear May) as the Rondo's charming principal theme. In 6/8 time, this movement can't help but make one smile: Think Steve Martin playing a banjo with a fake arrow piercing his head. Woodwinds try and fail to interrupt the fun. Mozart is at his cheeky happiest in the last movement of the last piano concerto he ever composed. A flurry of notes lead to a slam-dunk cadence.

—Aaron Beck

Mozart composed the K. 595 Piano Concerto from 1788 to 1791.

Alec Templeton was the soloist in The Philadelphia Orchestra's first performance of the Concerto, in April 1948 on a Pension Fund Benefit Concert; Eugene Ormandy conducted. The first subscription performances were in January 1962, with Rudolf Serkin and Ormandy. Since then it has been played on subscription less than a dozen times, most recently in October 2017 with pianist Emanuel Ax and Yannick Nézet-Séguin.

The Philadelphians recorded the piece in 1962, with Serkin and Ormandy.

Mozart scored the Concerto for solo piano, flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, and strings.

The work runs approximately 30 minutes in performance.
